SWIFT RETRIBUTION.

An Unprovoked Murder in Nebraska Followed by the Lynching of the Perpetrator of the Deed.

HASTINGS, Neb., March 17.—Saturday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock as W. W. Lewis, of Bloomfield, Neb., a village of 200 inhabitants, sat in his butcher shop reading a newspaper he was startled by the words: "You are the man I've been looking for two or three days," and, glancing up, was confronted by a revolver in the hands of A. J. Stratton, a bachelor living a mile south of Bloomfield. Stratton immediately commenced firing, the first shot taking effect in Lewis' breast, passing into his lungs. Lewis ran out into the back yard, followed by Stratton, who fired another shot at the fleeing man, which took effect in his back, killing him instantly. The arrest of the murderer was effected by the village authorities. A large crowd of impatiently excited people rapidly gathered uttering threats of lynching. Inside of thirty minutes from the termination of Lewis' life a band of masked and armed men marched through the crowd, consisting of almost the entire population of the place, to the village jail, broke the lock and dragged the murderer by a rope around the neck to a livery barn near by, where he was strung from a rafter. No one interfered. The crowd arrived soon after, cut down the body, and the mutilated remains were rendered "death by hanging by parties unknown." No motive is known for the murder of Mr. Lewis, who leaves a wife and five children.
