WHAT DID HE MEAN?

The master of the house reviewed the decorations which had just been completed. "How do you like them, sir?" the painter asked, as he packed up his tools. "I'm very pleased indeed," said the house-owner. "Here's half-a-crown for you. Take the missus to the pictures."

In the evening the front door bell rang, and the master of the house opened the door. To his surprise there stood the painter dressed in his Sunday best. "Well, my man, what do you want?" he asked. "I've come to take the missus to the pictures as you said," replied the painter—London Answers Magazine.

Obituary

Edgar A. Soules
Edgar A. Soules was born July 4, 1863 upon the old Soules homestead in Vergennes. This home is now owned by Miss Grace Bland. He was united in marriage to Lillian Barber of Lowell July 4, 1884. To this union were born two sons and four daughters. Mr. Soules and family moved from Vergennes over forty years ago. After having lived in Coral, Howard City and Lakeview for a time they moved to Sturgis and have resided there for over thirty years.

Mrs. Soules passed away a number of years ago and later Mr. Soules married Mrs. Blanche Reynolds, who with his six children and their families, survive him. Mr. Soules was a very active member for fifty years of the Church of God. He was highly respected by all who knew him. He was active in business for many years but during the last year his health had failed him. After months of suffering he passed away at his home in Sturgis Sept. 24, aged 75 years.

The funeral was held Tuesday afternoon from the church he attended and helped to build up, and his remains were laid to rest in the beautiful cemetery near his late home.

Besides his immediate family, Mr. Soules is survived by a brother, Edward of Washington, Mrs. Mary Soules of Lowell being a sister-in-law and J. S. Brandebury of Grand Rapids a brother-in-law, also a large number of nieces and nephews.

Horse Bot War At First Frost

Frost is the sign that will signal start of the annual war in the fall on bot fly eggs and subsequent treatment of horses to rid them of parasites.

Suggestion of B. J. Killham, extension specialist in animal pathology at Michigan State College, is that the first step in parasites control is the treatment of the bot fly eggs.

Farmers in Kent county, says Dr. Killham, can watch for the first killing frost and mark it down to start the work. Divisions will include healthier animals turning out useful energy rather than wasting feed on internal parasites.

Eggs deposited by the bot fly in summer and early fall are found attached to the hairs on various parts of the body. Chiefly these eggs cling to the forelegs, under the jaw and around nose and mouth of the horse.

A three per cent solution of a good coal tar dip (carbolic acid, lye or any good commercial dip) in warm water effectively checks further hatching of the eggs. One tablespoon of the dip in a pint of warm water makes a usable solution of three per cent. This solution should be applied thoroughly to the forelegs and other parts of the horse's body where bot flies are observed.

The internal treatment, administered by a qualified veterinarian, should follow any time after 30 days following the application of the coal tar dip solution. This internal treatment will remove round worms as well as bots. Early removal of the bots gets them when they are small and before they have had a chance to seriously injure the horse.

"None of Your Business"

By MARION E. JONES
© McClure Newspaper Syndicate, WNU Service.

THE train chugged and panted into the low-roofed station. Rain fell dismally, washing the gray stones of the building and getting into clear puddles on the concrete walk. An ancient-looking taxi wheezed expectantly beside the platform as the driver left it and dripped a course of puddles towards me.

"Taxi, sir," he said affirmatively. I looked about, puzzled thoughts centering on the non-appearance of a certain brown-eyed girl who should have been very evident with a smart roadster. But the landscape remained blank and rainy. Incidentally, I was getting very wet, so I dashed for the taxi.

The grim-looking driver followed me, slumped down behind the wheel and turned for directions. "Armstrong, 43 Sheldon, 'ce," I informed him. "I expect Miss Armstrong to meet me, but something seems to have delayed her."

A queer expression flashed over his face and he acted as if he were about to speak, then thought better of it and turned to devote himself to getting speed from his hopeless pile of junk. But just before the roar of the engine drowned them, I caught words said to himself. "Well, 'tain't none of my business. Well, 'tain't none of my business."

An older study of Grace opened the door, and I inwardly breathed easier. Grace could grow to look like the good-looking personality without my ever feeling any regrets. For serene, graceful middle age, Grace's mother left nothing to be asked for.

"I'm sure this is Mr. Clarke," she greeted me. "It's most unfortunate that Grace has been called out of town unexpectedly and won't be able to get back while you are here. Do come in. She was so upset to have to go."

With a brusqueness born of disappointment, I asked, "Where's she gone?" Just then, from some unseen region, a raucous voice screamed, "None of your business!"

Mrs. Armstrong laughed nervously. "Oh, dear," she sighed, "what a reception for you with Grace gone and that saucy parrot talking so. Well, putting it briefly, her dearest friend, Lydia Allen, was taken seriously ill and she was sent for. So, of course, she felt obliged to go. You understand, don't you?"

"Well, I have an important engagement in town tomorrow, so I cannot stay the three days we planned," I lied. "I wanted to see Grace, though, so decided to come just the same. Where does her friend live?"

"Oh, about a hundred miles from here," said her mother hastily. "A little town called Severna." "Is that so? I never heard of it. What's the matter with her friend?"

"Matter, oh—er, she was in a bad automobile accident."

I thought a minute. Would you say anyone had been taken seriously ill if she had been smashed up in an accident? I suppose she would be, but the term doesn't seem to fit, somehow.

The doorbell rang, and acting glad to escape from me, Mrs. Armstrong hurried out. A murmur of voices in the hall, something said in hushed undertones, then Grace flew into the room and my arms!

"Mistake, darling," she cried, lifting her rosy face finally to answer my questions. "I got someone else's call and the friend's name happened to be the same. I didn't stop to ask any questions, but rushed off. But I came right back when I found Helen was all right."

"I thought your mother said her name was Lydia."

"What? Oh, it is, but her middle name is Helen. I always call her that."

Three days later, my "important engagement" having been settled by phone, I took the train back to town. The conductor was communicative, the train nearly empty, and I had a rear seat. Among other things this came out: "You know, I had a funny one last Saturday. Pesch of a red-haired girl came in on this train from that town we've just left. She had a young lawyer with her that I know, and they just made the train in that old taxi back there."

"They had bags, and from scraps of their talk that I heard it looked like an elopement. But when the sun was half over the girl began to look queer. I could see him begin to argue with her, but she got up and took her bag, just as we slowed into Weldon. I reminded her that her ticket read through to town, but she tossed her head. 'Never mind, I'm getting off here.' Then, to him, and I heard it all: 'Don't argue any more, Dick. I know now I love Kershaw and I've got to get back before he comes today if I can.'"

"What if you don't?" says he. "Mother will tell him something till I do. She vowed she'd never tell him the truth while he was there."

My name is Kershaw, Grace had wonderful red hair, and Saturday was the day I arrived in her town. Well, what of it? We're married now and circumstantial evidence is none of my business.
