MY FRIEND FLICKA by MARY OHARA

CHAPTER XVII
At dinner, Ken ate nothing. How said, "Ken isn't eating his dinner—doesn't he have to eat, Mother?"

Ken had understood what his father meant when he said "I won't have a thing like that on my plate."

When Ken saw that he stopped walking. He felt dizzy. He kept staring at the gun rack, telling himself that it surely was there—there he had seen it—

Then he felt an arm across his shoulders and heard his father's voice. "I know, son. Some things are awful to take. We just have to take 'em. I have to, too."

Ken got hold of his father's hand and held on. It helped steady him. Finally he looked up. Bob looked down and smiled at him and gave him a little shake and squeeze. Ken managed a smile too.

"All right now?"
"Right, Dad."
They walked in to supper together. Ken even ate a little. But Nell looked thoughtfully at the ashtray and the little pulse that was beating in the side of his neck.

Ken carried Flicka over his shoulder, but he had to coax her and she would hardly touch. She stood with her head hanging, but when he stroked it and talked to her, she pressed her face into his chest and was content.

He could feel the burning heat of her body. It didn't seem possible that anything so thin could be alive. Presently Ken saw Gus come into the pasture carrying the winches.

When he saw Ken, he changed his direction and sauntered along as if he was out to shoot cotton-tails. Ken ran to him. "When are you going to do it, Gus?"

"Gus, don't do it tonight. Wait till morning. Just one more night, Gus."
"Well, in de morning den, but it got to be done, Ken. Yer fadder gess de order."

"I know. I won't say anything more."
Gus went back to the bank house and Ken returned to the creek. He stood by her, smoothing and caressing her as he always did. Usually he talked to her, but he couldn't do that now. There was only one thing in his mind, and he couldn't talk about that.

Below the cottonwood trees, the darkness fell swiftly, and Ken and Flicka were hidden in it together. It folded them around and held them close. He couldn't see her, and she couldn't see him, but he moved around her, and her head turned to follow him so that her forehead rested against him, as she always did. The darkness pressed them closer together.

At nine o'clock Howard was sent by Nell to call Ken. He stood at the corral gate, shouting.
Again there was the sound of soft moaning. Then Ken pressed a last flick on Flicka's face, and went up the hill under the cottonwoods. Flicka was still standing in her nursery when the full moon rose at ten. It was the Hunter's Moon, as yellow as the Harvest Moon.
