being used. That meant it was an inside job. When we entered this apartment the kid here snapped off the radio a little too quickly. It wasn't natural. Upstairs, I found all the other apartments deserted, so I switched on a radio, then worked the elevator. The electric motor created plenty of static. A man who checked his timing could tell how many floors the elevator was descending by listening to the static on his radio. And that would be a dead give-away that Trumbell was out, because he's the only one who lives on the sixth? Get it?"
