Donations to the annual drive, by local residents, boosted the project's distribution to a record volume, allowing each family to receive a Christmas package loaded with toys, candy, ciothing, etc.

Dispute over names on plaque leads to complete removal

Lowell's new Waste Water Treatment Plant went into official operation this week following the formal dedication Wednesday morning. The plant was built by Erhart Construction Co. for $327,400, with engineering and other expenses bringing the total price to approximately $360,000. Construction started last spring and was completed ahead of schedule. The building houses treatment facilities for the waste solids that enter the system. There is pumping equipment and a complete laboratory for checking the operation of the plant.

Sour note mars dedication ...

The only sour note in the dedication of the Waste Water Treatment Plant on Wednesday was caused by the plaque pictured above. The plaque was ordered removed and destroyed by the City Council in their meeting on Monday night. The plaque failed to carry the name of former councilman, Charles R. Doyle, who served on the council that contracted for the plant. He asked, through his attorney, that the plaque be removed and one carrying his name be erected. The council voted to destroy this plaque but not to install a new one.

The City Council voted on Monday night to remove and destroy the plaque placed on the new Waste Water Treatment Plant being put into operation this week, south of Recreation Park.

In his letter, Mr. Walen wrote "the holiday season was a happier, more meaningful occasion for many of the less fortunate citizens of our community because of the thoughtfulness and generosity of many groups and organizations such as your own.

There obviously is no need to explain to you how limited are the Kent County Depart-ment of Social Services' means when it comes to providing any-thing beyond the bare necessit-ies for those whom we serve.
